Concerning abandoned wells that could be leaking in the Gulf: "In the absence of any better information, that's the most reasonable conclusion that anyone can draw."

Concerning the role of MMS and government oversight of the wells: "When you're talking about periodically inspecting the 20,000 or so plus abandoned wells on the bottom of the sea floor, that's a big job..."

"One of the things here at SkyTruth that we'd really like to see is routine satellite monitoring of the entire Gulf area where we do oil drilling in order to spot small problems before they become big ones."

"...no matter how good we think our technology is..."

"But John Amos, the geologist who wrote the study, told AP that MMS withheld critical information that could have helped verify if he had pinpointed the problem. "I kind of suspected that this was a project almost designed to fail," Amos said. He said the agency refused to tell him "how big and widespread a problem" they were dealing with in the Gulf. Amos is now director of SkyTruth, a nonprofit group that uses satellite imagery to detect environmental problems. He still believes that technology could work on abandoned wells."
